

Heilsundr

Eirvorr calls Friedhelm “Heilsundr” (Sacred Fragment / Holy Division),

THE IMPORTANT REALIZATION

Sukuna starts to understand:

Eirvorr is not describing Friedhelm as:

- damaged
- tragic
- incomplete

But as:

someone whose continuity is proven through separation itself.

Which reframes everything Sukuna has seen:

- Friedhelm’s composure under stress
- his ability to attach without collapsing
- his strange stability when close to Sukuna
- his shift in dependency after Leora

All of it stops looking like adaptation...

and starts looking like structure.

THE PERSONAL IMPACT

This is where it gets sharp for Sukuna:

Because if Friedhelm is “Heilsundr,” then:

- Friedhelm does not “cling” to people for survival

- he reforms himself through chosen bonds

And Sukuna realizes something he does not immediately like admitting:

Friedhelm choosing him is not compensation for loss.

It is continuation.

That makes Sukuna more attentive afterward.

Not softer.

More precise.

More observant.

Like he is recalibrating what Friedhelm actually is in relation to him.

FINAL EMOTIONAL NOTE

Sukuna's deepest reaction is not fear or admiration.

It is this subtle, grounding realization:

Eirvorr did not give Friedhelm a name that explains him.

He gave him a name that suggests he is still becoming what he was always meant to remain after breaking.

And Sukuna, who understands permanence and attachment in his own way, recognizes the danger in that immediately:

Because something that becomes whole through division does not stay static.

It chooses where it reforms.
