

Leora's Prophecy (Why she made it):

Prophecy about Sukuna and why she made the "Ward-Lock" bracelet:

"You know," she said slowly, and her voice was wrong in a way he couldn't immediately categorize, "you're incapable of being less."

Sukuna blinked once. That was not what he had expected her to say.

Leora didn't stop. "You're so incapable of it," she continued, eyes fixed on him now, "you make it hard for enemies to decide how they can defeat you."

His brow furrowed slightly. "...What are you talking about?"

But she didn't answer him directly. Not anymore. Her thoughts had already moved ahead. "Your foes have always had to shift away from certainty."

A pause.

Like she was watching something unfold that he couldn't see. "Because the only certainty left now is they cannot kill you cleanly," she said, voice tightening slightly, "and they cannot overcome you physically enough to make you choose submission."

Sukuna's hand closed around her wrist. "Leora," he said sharply, searching her face now. "Stop. What is this?"

Her breath caught.

"So," she continued, voice thinner now but still carrying forward like it had already committed itself, "the only way to force the King of Curses to submit is to forcibly make him small in portions."

Sukuna's grip tightened slightly.

Leora's gaze stayed locked on him.

"Not to defeat you," she said, and there was something almost hollow in her tone now, "but to reduce you into something manageable in pieces."

A pause.

"So they can feel larger next to you."

The words landed in him wrong.

"And even that," she added faintly, "should annoy them."

Sukuna's eyes narrowed. "Leora." "

Promise me."

Sukuna went still.

"Even if you are divided," she said, and now her voice cracked slightly in a way she fought to control, "you will always remain yourself."

Sukuna's skin prickled.

"Promise me you'll bring yourself back together," she said, and the words were steadier now but worse for it, "and come back to me."

THE CORE CONCEPT

The bracelet was designed to solve one problem:

“If they cannot divide him, they cannot contain him.”

Leora understands something before almost anyone else:

Sukuna’s true danger is not death.

It is:

partition.

Fragmentation.

Identity separation.

Because no one can truly overpower Sukuna directly.

So eventually:
they will try to reduce him into pieces.

And Leora absolutely refuses to allow that future to happen uncontested.

WHAT THE BRACELET ACTUALLY IS

The bracelet is called:

The Vardlokkr

(“Ward-Lock” / “Binding Denial”)

Forged from:

- Wulf’s oath band

- Leora's rune baptismal mark
- sacrificial life force
- soul-thread
- anti-binding forgecraft from Návmiðr

Its function is:

to force Sukuna's existence to remain recognized as singular.

As long as he wears it:

- soul division becomes unstable
- forced fragmentation resists completion
- binding rituals reject permanent ownership
- cursed containment weakens

The bracelet essentially tells reality:

"Ryomen Sukuna is one being."

"You may kill him."

"You may wound him."

"But you may not separate him."

WHY IT REQUIRED SUCH HORRIFIC SACRIFICE

Because Leora was attempting to oppose:

collective future sorcery.

Not one ritual.

Not one enemy.

An entire era's worth of eventual binding attempts.

The bracelet needed enough:

- life
- permanence
- identity

- resistance to oppose centuries of ritual accumulation.

That is why over a thousand innocent souls were required.

Not for cruelty.

For weight.

The forge demanded:

enough life to oppose mass consensus.

And then:
it still wasn't enough.

WHY LEORA ADDED HER OWN SOUL

The forge-smiths tell her:

- Sukuna's soul is too immense
- too adaptive
- too violent
- too singular

The bracelet needs:

a permanent reference point.

Something capable of identifying Sukuna absolutely,
even through:

- reincarnation
- fragmentation attempts
- cursed residue
- soul damage

So Leora gives:

part of her own soul-pattern.

That becomes the hidden rune sealed inside the bracelet.

Meaning:
the bracelet recognizes Sukuna through:

Leora's attachment to him specifically.

Not abstractly.

Personally.

That is terrifyingly intimate.

THE PROPHECY CONNECTION

Then comes the devastating part.

After the birthday songs,
Friedhelm's prophecy reveals:

Sukuna will still be divided into fingers.

Meaning:
Leora failed.

Or seemingly failed.

And that destroys her emotionally because:

she already paid the cost.

Thousands dead.
Her own soul damaged.
Ancient laws broken.

And fate still wins.

Which is why she becomes so quiet afterward.

So obsessive about him wearing it.

So controlling about:

"Do not remove it."

Because somewhere deep down:
she still hopes the prophecy can be bent.

Not prevented entirely.

Bent.

WHAT EIRVORR SHOWS SUKUNA

Eirvorr eventually reveals all this not to shame Leora—but because Sukuna deserves to understand:

what she attempted for him.

The vision should devastate him because:
Leora is utterly alone during all of it.

No Friedhelm.
No Wulf.
No family.

Just:
Leora descending beneath Death carrying his bracelet-to-be.

And the worst part:

She looks terrified.

Not of the forge.

Not of the gods.

Of:

failing him.

THE MOST IMPORTANT SCENE

At the forge,
the corpse-smiths examine the future around Sukuna.

Then one says:

“This one ends divided.”

Leora answers immediately:

“Then make division impossible.”

The smith replies:

“Fate has already touched him.”

And Leora says the line that should emotionally ruin Sukuna:

“Then I will touch him harder.”

That is the moment the forge agrees.

WHY THIS MATTERS TO SUKUNA

Because Sukuna realizes:

- she believed the prophecy enough to commit atrocity
- she tried to fight fate alone
- she damaged her own soul for him
- and she never demanded gratitude afterward

Worse:
she handed him the bracelet casually.

Almost gently.

Just:

“Don’t take it off.”

As though it were something simple.

And now Sukuna realizes:
that bracelet contains:

- slaughter
- terror
- soul sacrifice
- and Leora's refusal to let the world own him.

Which means:
every time he wore it,
he was carrying:

the physical manifestation of her desperation to keep him whole.

SCENE OUTLINE — “THE WARD-LOCK”

PURPOSE OF THE SCENE

Eirvorr reveals:

- what Sukuna's bracelet truly is
- where Leora went to forge it
- what she sacrificed
- and how long she has feared his eventual binding

This is not merely exposition.

This scene should feel like:

Sukuna discovering the physical proof that Leora tried to wage war against fate itself for him.

And worse:

she did it alone.

OPENING — AFTER THE FIGHT

Setting

The aftermath of Sukuna and Eirvorr's battle.

The frozen threshold forest has gone quiet.

Black snow drifts through ruined trees split apart by Cleave.

Eirvorr sits across from Sukuna beside a dead fire made from pale wood that burns silver instead of orange.

Sukuna is injured but upright.

Calm again.

The bracelet visible around his wrist.

Eirvorr keeps staring at it.

Not casually.

Hungrily.

Reverently.

Like he recognizes something ancient inside it.

Finally:

“You still wear it.”

Sukuna glances down briefly.

“She told me not to remove it.”

Eirvorr smiles slowly.

Dangerously.

“Of course she did.”

PART I — EIRVORR ASKS THE IMPORTANT QUESTION

Eirvorr reaches out suddenly and grips Sukuna's wrist.

Not hostile.

But impossibly firm.

The bracelet reacts instantly.

Silver runes flare beneath the metal.

The forest itself recoils.

Snow hisses into steam.

Eirvorr's expression changes immediately.

Recognition.

Then genuine surprise.

For perhaps the first time:
the deity looks disturbed.

Quietly:

“She used Návsmiðr.”

Sukuna narrows his eyes.

“What is that?”

Long silence.

Then Eirvorr answers:

“A place gods prefer forgotten.”

PART II — THE DESCENT TO NÁVSMIÐR

Eirvorr forces Sukuna into the memory embedded within the bracelet.

The transition should feel violent.

Suddenly:

- freezing black ocean
- dead stars overhead
- chains hanging beneath ice
- massive rib bones protruding from dark water

And there—
deep beneath Death itself—

stands:

NÁVSMIÐR

The Corpse-Smithy.

DESCRIPTION — NÁVSMIÐR

The forge is built inside:

the skeleton of something ancient enough that even gods no longer name it.

Its ribs form cathedral arches.

Its spine burns molten beneath black ice.

Thousands of bells hang from chains overhead.

Each bell contains:

the final name of someone erased through binding.

The sound they make is horrifying:
soft.
Human.
Almost like breathing.

Sukuna immediately understands:
this place forged the first restraints ever placed upon souls.

PART III — THE CORPSE-SMITHS

The Nálsmiðir emerge from the darkness.

Not alive.
Not dead.

Descriptions:

- ash-gray flesh split with molten silver
- mouths sewn shut with rune wire
- blackened hands burned permanently from soul-forging
- iron antler growths piercing through backs and shoulders

They do not speak normally.

Their voices sound:

inside the bones.

One of them sees Leora approaching and says:

“A living thing enters willingly.”

Another:

“Carrying attachment.”

Then:

“Carrying prophecy.”

That word makes Sukuna's stomach turn instantly.

Because this happened:
before the birthday songs.

Before confirmation.

Meaning:
Leora already feared the future.

PART IV — LEORA ARRIVES

Leora walks alone into the forge.

No hesitation.

No visible fear.

But Sukuna notices something horrifying immediately:

She looks exhausted already.

Like she has spent weeks deciding whether to do this.

In her hands:

- Wulf's oath band
- wrapped carefully in cloth
- treated almost reverently

Eirvorr's voice overlaps the memory quietly:

“That band once belonged to the strongest binder the Gegner bloodline ever produced.”

Then:

“She destroyed it for you.”

PART V — THE FORGE EXAMINES SUKUNA

The corpse-smiths touch the band.

Instantly:
visions rupture through the forge.

Sukuna sees flashes:

- shrines
- fingers
- binding seals
- future sorcerers
- his soul divided
- mouths praying over severed remains

The forge goes silent.

Then one smith says:

“This one ends partitioned.”

Another:

“Not killed.”

“Separated.”

Then:

“The world will fear him too greatly to leave him whole.”

Leora answers immediately:

“Then make separation impossible.”

PART VI — THE PRICE

The smiths explain:

- Sukuna’s existence is too immense
- future sorcery too accumulated
- too many eventual bindings already converge around him

To resist fate itself:
the bracelet requires:

- mass life force
- innocence
- permanence
- identity anchor

One smith says:

“A thousand undeserving lives.”

No reaction from Leora.

Another:

“And more.”

Now she pauses.

Finally:

“How much more?”

The answer:

“Part of the soul that loves him.”

Silence.

Even Sukuna goes cold hearing it.

Because she does not hesitate.

Not even for a second.

PART VII — THE SLAUGHTER

Do not depict this graphically.

Instead:
make it ritualistic and horrifying.

Leora walks through candlelit chambers beneath the forge.

Thousands of souls suspended like pale lights beneath black water.

Each one extinguishes slowly as the forge consumes them.

The bells overhead begin ringing one by one.

Soft.

Mournful.

Endless.

Sukuna realizes:

every bell is a life she traded for him.

And she keeps walking.

PART VIII — LEORA'S SOUL

At the center forge:

the molten metal burns silver-white.

Leora places:

- Wulf's oath band
- her rune mark
- and finally her own blood into the fire.

The forge still rejects it.

Then one smith says:

"It does not recognize him completely."

And Leora finally understands:

the bracelet needs:

her.

So she cuts open her own chest.

Not dramatically.

Deliberately.

Soul-thread spills from the wound:
silver and pale blue intertwined with runes.

Even the smiths recoil.

Because:
humans are not supposed to survive this willingly.

One whispers:

“You would cripple your own soul for a future not yet written?”

Leora answers:

“He will remain whole.”

PART IX — THE LINE THAT DESTROYS SUKUNA

The forge warns her:

“Fate has already touched him.”

Leora steps closer to the fire.

Eyes unwavering.

Then says:

“Then I will touch him harder.”

Silence.

The forge accepts the offering immediately afterward.

PART X — THE BRACELET IS FORGED

The bracelet emerges:

- blackened silver
- lined internally with her hidden rune
- warm like living skin
- impossibly heavy for its size

The corpse-smiths warn her:

“It will not stop fate entirely.”

Another:

“Only resist it.”

Then:

“He may still be divided.”

For the first time—
Leora visibly breaks.

Not outwardly.

Just:
one tiny inhale.

Pain.

But then she steadies herself again.

And says quietly:

“Then let him feel me fighting for him when it happens.”

That line should ruin Sukuna emotionally.

PART XI — RETURN TO THE PRESENT

The memory ends violently.

Sukuna is back in the frozen forest with Eirvorr.

Snow falling softly.

The bracelet suddenly feels impossibly heavy on his wrist.

Eirvorr watches him carefully.

Then says quietly:

“She walked beneath Death itself to keep the world from owning you.”

A pause.

Then:

“And still you wonder why gods became interested in her.”

Sukuna's Construct

Sukuna wears a magical construct that conceals his true body, reducing his four arms, extra eyes, and other inhuman features into a more conventional human form.

He did not create it out of shame, insecurity, or a desire to be accepted.

He created it because his true form fundamentally changes the atmosphere of every room he enters.

People stare. Conversations stop. Attention shifts to him instead of his family. His sheer physical presence dominates ordinary domestic life. Sukuna understood that his appearance would make it difficult for Leora and the children to experience a peaceful, ordinary home.

After Tsukihiko's birth, he gradually began maintaining the construct almost constantly within family life. His goal was simple: he wanted his children to know him as their father before they knew him as something extraordinary.

For Sukuna, this was never a sacrifice. It was the obvious solution. He never expected gratitude, never spoke about it, and eventually stopped thinking about it altogether. The construct became part of his everyday domestic identity.

Thematic Importance

This choice represents one of Sukuna's greatest acts of love.

Rather than demanding the world adapt to him, he quietly adapted himself to protect the emotional environment of the people he loved. He did not become less monstrous—he simply stopped needing his monstrosity to be constantly witnessed.

Fatherhood changed what he valued. Domestic peace became more important than being seen exactly as he was.

Leora's Realization

When Leora finally asks why he maintains the construct, she realizes she has unknowingly lived beside this quiet act of devotion for years.

Her grief is not rooted in the concealment itself, but in what it represents: an entire stage of their family's life ended so gradually that neither of them noticed.

She remembers their early years physically—how Sukuna held multiple children at once with four arms, how Kaguya slept against his stomach mouth, how his true body shaped the family's everyday rituals. Those memories were never monstrous to her; they were simply expressions of fatherhood.

Higan, however, only knows Sukuna's constructed form.

This realization devastates Leora because it means their youngest child never experienced that earlier chapter of their family—not because Higan was loved less, but because time quietly changed the shape of fatherhood without either of them recognizing the loss.

Emotional Resolution

Leora initially interprets Sukuna's concealment as a tremendous sacrifice made for her.

Sukuna rejects that interpretation completely.

He never believed domestic life diminished him. Loving Leora and raising their children gave meaning to parts of himself he had never valued before. The quiet years were not a compromise—they were the only years he truly enjoyed existing peacefully.

The scene ultimately becomes one of mutual recognition.

Leora realizes the depth of Sukuna's unseen devotion.

Sukuna realizes that every part of his true self—including the parts he stopped showing the world—had always been remembered and cherished by Leora.

The construct therefore symbolizes not self-denial, but love expressed through quiet adaptation. It is one of the clearest demonstrations that Sukuna chose family over being perceived exactly as he was, while never ceasing to be the being he had always been.

